Panel Suggests Signs of Trouble Before Rig Explosion
By HENRY FOUNTAIN and TOM ZELLER Jr.
Published: May 25, 2010
In the hours before the Deepwater Horizon oil rig exploded last month in the Gulf of Mexico, there were strong warning signs that something was terribly wrong with the well, according to a Congressional committee that was briefed on the accident by executives from BP.

Among the red flags, the panel said, were several equipment readings suggesting that gas was bubbling into the well, a potential sign of an impending blowout. Investigators also noted "other events in the 24 hours before the explosion that require further inquiry,"

Slowdown Fear Hits Market
First 'Correction' For U.S. Stocks Since Bull Began Video
Images
By Tom Lauricella
New worries about the health of the global economy flared Thursday, driving U.S. stocks to their first official correction since the bull market began last March, roiling credit markets and causing swings in currencies.
Large investors, such as hedge funds, pared back riskier investments that tend to do better in a global economic rebound but get hammered harder in a slowdown. Many shed investments in emerging-market or commodity-producing countries like Brazil or Australia. Such investments had been a popular way to bet that the global economies were recovering from the steep recession that grew out of the financial crisis.
Investors, meantime, snapped up U.S. Treasurys and the Japanese yen, assets viewed as relatively safe in times of turmoil.
There was no one particular piece of news that drove Thursday's market swoon. Instead, investors said it was an accumulation of worrisome

K thru 12 Education
K-12 education programs provide academic services to pupils between the ages services are standards-based academic instruction, special education services, programs, child care and development services, teacher recruitment and develop remedial instruction services. These programs work together to provide Californian successful adulthood, achieving career goals, obtaining gainful employment, and opportunities.
Higher Education
Higher Education provides the adult population with basic and career skills, postsecondary, graduate and doctoral instruction, and research to develop the workforce, intellectual capital, and innovations necessary to promote the economy and well being of the state's citizenry. The specific missions for each of the three publicly funded higher education systems, including the California Community Colleges, the California State University, and the University of California, are addressed in those segments' mission statements. The Student Aid Commission ensures financial assistance for needy students.
