Update: BumpTop now confirms it was acquired by Google, terms were not disclosed. The company raised $1.65 million in seed funding from Canadian angels and VCs, and the purchase price is rumored to be between $25 million and $35 million.

Rumors are swirling that 3D desktop interface Canadian startup BumpTop has been acquired by Google. We started getting tips yesterday pointing to a now-deleted Tweet from a Canadian VC saying Google had acquired them. When I called CEO Anand Agarawala on Friday to ask if BumpTop was acquired, he responded, "Not that I know of." But today, there is a notice on BumpTop's homepage saying that it will discontinue its current products and has a big announcement coming:

Google Wave Finds Purpose as Live Blogging Platform

Written by Frederic Lardinois / April 30, 2010 12:10 PM / 9 Comments

Do you remember Google Wave? After a lot of hype around the initial launch of Wave - which some pundits billed as an "email killer" at the time - things have been rather quiet around the service. The latest update to Wave, however, could push the service back into the public eye. Publishers can now easily embed waves on their sites and readers can see them without having to be logged in to Wave, which makes Wave a great live blogging platform.

Wave for Live Blogging (and more)

At first glance, this looks like a minor update, but for the first time, you can now easily embed waves on your own site. Google notes that you could use Wave for real-time RSVPs with the YesNoMaybe gadget and to publish documentation via embedded waves. For us, however, the real potential here is live blogging with Wave.

The interesting thing about using Wave as a live blogging platform, of course, is that readers can see what a blogger is writing in real time. Live blogging doesn't get more real time than that.

Wave allows users to easily style text and embed images and videos. Adding additional writers to a wave is also as easy as adding another contact to the wave.

Wave Elements: Embedding Waves Made Easy

Until now, embedding Waves took a bit of work and users who weren't logged in to Wave weren't able to see your updates. Thanks to the newly released Wave Element tool, however, embedding a wave is now simply a matter of copying and pasting a snippet of JavaScript into your site or blog post. To make a wave public, you also have to add the `public@agwave.com` account to your wave.

You can see an example of what an embedded Wave looks like below.

One Caveat: Doesn't Work With Internet Explorer Yet

The Wave team, however, also points out one major deal-breaker: the embedded waves don't work with Internet Explorer yet (even with Chrome Frame). The team plans to resolve this issue soon, however.

Google wave | dclinton@googlewave.com

Frederic Lardinois, Nathan Chase and Manuel Quinteiro: Embedded Waves for Live Blogging 11:03 am

<http://googlewavedev.blogspot.com/2010/04/embed-api-improvements-viewing-public.html>

KR29000, Frederic Lardinois and Grégory MAUBON: nice Apr 30

KR29000, Jason H and Jaamit: As long as I cannot lock down my own content...Wave is completely useless. May 1

Pamela Fox: FYI, You can embed a wave that is public read-only, instead of public full-access, and that way only you (and whoever else you explicitly add) can do the editing. If your goal is just to show users your opinions in real time, then you don't need them to be editing/replying. If your goal is having discussions, like here, then you might do a full-access wave, or you might do a combination of a read-only wave for your content and a full-access wave for the discussion below. Apr 30

Joel Webber: I guess that depends upon how you define "your own". You can't modify someone else's blips without leaving your name on them (and a trace in the wave history), and the owner (of the wave, not the blip) can always rewind to Apr 30
